Disparities in general cardiovascular disease screening in African American women with diabetes. African American women with diabetes have a disproportionately higher prevalence of cardiovascular disease (CVD) risk factors than non-diabetic African American women. In this study, we examined the proportion of African American women with diabetes who are undergoing general CVD screening and identified factors associated with undergoing screening. We examined data from 2,668 women enrolled in the Cooperative Women's Health Study of coronary risk factors, between 1997 and 1999. Chi-square tests examined the relationships between undergoing screening and individual characteristics. Multivariate logistic regression was used to estimate the adjusted odds ratio (OR) and 95% confidence interval (95% CI) of undergoing screening, using the non-diabetic group as the referent group. Compared to non-diabetic women, diabetics were more likely to undergo lipid screening (OR 1.34, 95% CI 1.04-1.72), lipid-lowering drug screening (OR 2.24

The application is similar to a traditional file manager, and comes with all the necessary tools and functionality for organizing your data. The application allows for the browsing of all folders and files, even though, depending on the folder and file structure, this may take up a considerable amount of space. The file editor is a bit limited, as it features limited editing features, but it can be switched to a more simplified mode, allowing for less complex actions. Once you've selected the desired files, you can use the interface to preview them, apply tags, rename, and other basic functionality. Applications like RightFolder, that offer such a wide range of features, while being quite compact in design, can be quite useful when running large amounts of data.
