Oct 2, 2015. let's get to the new Warhammer 40,000 Kill Team rules. The second edition of the game rules (2013) is the most recent add.Q. Wait for a thread to finish executing before starting new one I have a piece of code: def execution(): some long running task if some_condition: do_a_thing_1() do_a_thing_2() else: do_the_other_thing() When the execution method is ran, I need to make sure that the other thread is still running and the if block is not being skipped. I tried making 2 global variables: global_done global_executing When the execution method is ran, I add them to True, and when the if block is run, I check if they're both True, and only run the code block if they are. The issue with this is that the code is always finished running before the if statement is executed. I was thinking of running the stuff inside if into its own function and setting a flag with a thread-local variable, but I don't think that would be very good practice. I would like to avoid changing the function and putting the code in the global scope. A: Go for a threading solution: from threading import Thread def execution(): if some_condition: # Thread.start_new_thread(do_a_thing_1, ()) Thread(target=do_a_thing_1).start()
