The fate of the anterior intercalatus artery during anterior cervical dissection. The fate of the anterior intercalatus artery (AIA) was investigated in 22 human cadaveric cervical spines using corrosion casting, selective corrosion casting, and microanatomic dissection. The AIA arose from the external carotid artery (ECA), followed a course between the anterior longitudinal ligament and anterior margin of the vertebral body, and, on reaching the inferior vertebral border, ran between the pleura and peritoneum. The AIA was clearly identified in 20 out of 22 cases. In the other two cases (nos. 10 and 11) there was an unusual variant of the AIA in which the artery originated from the ECA and coursed between the anterior margin of the vertebral body and the anterior intervertebral ligament. In this present study, the AIA was divided into two types depending on the course of the artery: the first type (the classic AIA) coursed between the anterior longitudinal ligament and vertebral body, while the second type coursed between the anterior margin of the vertebral body and the anterior intervertebral ligament. The mean bifurcation angle of the AIA was 27 degrees in men and 37 degrees in women. If the bifurcation angle of the AIA is less than 25 degrees, the AIA is prone to be damaged during anterior cervical dissection. This invention relates to trim strips for vehicle closures and more particularly to adhesive tape strips used for such closures. All present day vehicle bodies are provided with closures, generally termed doors, for rear and front access to the vehicle. The doors are made of plastic, metal, or a combination of these materials, and usually have an outer and inner panel. Typically, the inner panels are molded plastic sheets and the outer panels are rigid metal sheets. The door has a frame which is the outline of the door when the door is mounted on the vehicle. The panels are mounted in the frame by a variety of means,
