Yet, it hasn't been so long since The Privacy Alliance came together, said it had a positive impact, and formed the political impetus it needed. "The Privacy Alliance is a response to the challenges created by the intersection of technology and political change," said Michael Weidman, VP at the Center for Financial Services Innovation. At a recent pre-election event in Silicon Valley, the Privacy Alliance convened 30 top privacy-minded technologists, politicians and consumers to create a nonpartisan organization of privacy activists, champions and entrepreneurs. "When the voters go to the polls for the election on Nov. 2, they will be voting on privacy issues that have the potential to shape the course of the future of their lives," said Federal Trade Commission Chairman Jon Leibowitz. "The privacy of millions of Americans will be at stake. This Commission sees a unique and remarkable opportunity for working with others to advance the cause of privacy and safeguard consumers' most personal information. As the Commission seeks to safeguard privacy and advance consumer privacy rights, our goal is that these important policies and regulations will be adopted in a manner that is both comprehensive, effective and consumer-friendly." "The Privacy Alliance is a leader of industry and government working together to protect privacy," said Federal Trade Commissioner Julie Brill. "The Alliance helps make the American dream -- pursuing your dreams while protecting your privacy -- a reality for Americans, in part by mobilizing industry, government and the public to take action. We're working every day to ensure the power of technology is used to protect privacy." "An innovative approach for a time of unprecedented change. The Privacy Alliance puts collective leadership and citizen engagement in the driver's seat in the decision-making process of the future," said David Lane, SVP Technology and Consumerization at Autodesk. "At a time when the lines between security and privacy are more blurred than ever, it's essential that consumers have a collective voice," said Lindsay Anderson, Senior VP of Global Technology at Wells Fargo. "With the Privacy Alliance, we're fighting on all fronts
