Breast cancer is a multifaceted disease with a range of outcomes and treatment options. The information patients have about their treatment and its effects is needed to optimise care. This study reports the development and evaluation of a patient-reported outcomes (PROs) instrument to measure breast cancer-specific quality of life. Items were developed by reviewing the literature, consultation with clinicians, focus groups, and cognitive interviews, and were then tested in a pilot study of 105 patients. Items were refined in consultation with clinicians, another pilot study was undertaken, and the final version was then implemented into routine clinical practice. Breast cancer quality of life instruments have not been developed for general breast cancer populations. This study reports the development of a breast cancer-specific quality of life instrument that can be used in routine clinical practice. Items were generated by a review of the literature and consultation with clinicians, and further refined through focus groups and cognitive interviews. The draft instrument was tested with a pilot study of 105 patients in the UK, and was refined in consultation with the clinicians. The Breast Cancer Quality of Life Instrument comprises five dimensions: well-being, comfort and coping, physical function, sexuality, and impact of treatment. The instrument is internally consistent and reliable, and has a high level of content validity. The instrument was developed and evaluated in routine clinical practice. The Breast Cancer Quality of Life Instrument will allow clinicians to monitor and evaluate patients' quality of life with respect to the specific issues identified by patients.Jeff Chyba Jeffrey Francis Chyba (born May 25, 1953) is an American computer scientist and electrical engineer who is a professor at the University of Maryland, College Park.
