I have a switch that looks like this: switch (input.get.id) { case 1: preenter: (do something) break; case 2: preenter: (do something) break; case 3: preenter: (do something) break; case 4: preenter: (do something) break; //... } My question is whether it is better to set preenter and break in that preenter statement and if there is a better way to handle the situations described above, rather than having the //case blanks? A: Generally speaking if you have a function that performs the same thing regardless of the input - if it's one function - then a switch statement is the right way to go. If it's a series of repetitive functions, then maybe you want to look at a loop instead. to be a Chinese official looking for something, I was taken to one side of the stadium as the two men talked away. When they had finished, they waved me back and I approached the security checkpoint where I asked the official if I could take a picture. He then approached the man at the ticket office and I asked the question again as he listened, and then said yes in Chinese 6d1f23a050
