Elevated liver-specific enzyme levels in iron-overloaded ferroportin-deficient mice. Recently, the molecular identity of a hepatic membrane protein that is essential for dietary iron absorption and utilization in most mammals was identified. This protein, called ferroportin, is the sole known pathway for iron export from the intestine to the bloodstream. This pathway is also used by parenchymal cells to detoxify and redistribute iron within the body. In the present study, we showed that ferroportin-deficient mice have elevated levels of aspartate aminotransferase (AST) and glutamic-oxaloacetic transaminase (GOT), two liver-specific enzymes. This was associated with an intracellular iron accumulation within the liver. The iron-overload phenotype in ferroportin-deficient mice was evident, but not exacerbated, by aging. These results demonstrate a novel physiological role for the ubiquitously expressed liver-specific membrane protein ferroportin and are consistent with the hypothesis that ferroportin-mediated iron export is a crucial component of homeostasis of iron within cells.
