Loading The weather website had a post on Tuesday headlined "The God of Thunder is punishing America for its wicked ways". The article (which has since been removed) cited a meteorologist who said that excessive rain falls after major sporting events, such as the US Open, as well as many rain-soaked events in Europe, and the Pacific island of Kiribati in Oceania. But it also linked the increase in rainfall to Islam, citing the fact that a Sunni-inspired Muslim prophet is believed to have visions of rain at times of drought, and that Muhammad saw "the signs of rain when he looked out of his tent". The comments on the post were initially congratulatory, thanking the weather presenter for her "excellent work". But by Wednesday morning (local time), many Christians had taken to Twitter to complain about the post. "I am really appalled to see this tweet. There are plenty of other things a person can believe that cast a shadow over us. And this tweet isn't one of them," said one Twitter user. "This was supposed to be about weather forecasting, not... fear mongering," said another. "A lot of major sporting events have had little to no rain this year. From no clear blue skies to a groundswell that just won
